Travis Scott sued for cancelling Rhythm, Wine and Brews performance

By Casey Dolan - January 7, 2019

Travis Scott has been slapped with a lawsuit accusing him of bailing on the Rhythm, Wine, and Brews festival and forcing organizers to cancel the entire event. The festival accuses Scott of stealing over $200,000 in the lawsuit filed Friday, according to the Blast.

According to the documents, obtained by The Blast, Scott entered into a contract to perform at the 2019 Rhythm, Wine, and Brews Experience, held on the Empire Polo Grounds, the same place as the famous Coachella music festival.

Scott was to be paid $400,000 for a 75 minute performance, which was to take place on March 2, and the rapper was given a deposit of $217,500.

Empire Music Ventures claim they struck the deal with Scott and the manager of his company, called The Odd Group, on November 7, 2018. They claim that after the deposit was paid on December 3rd, Scott's people called and canceled the performance with no explanation.

The festival was then called off, "due to a last minute cancellation by our festival headliner."

The festival did not name the headliner at the time, but Scott was named in the lawsuit.

"Defendants have stolen Plaintiff's money," the suit claims, adding Scott and his manager "refuse to return the money ... each of them have kept it, and wrongfully converted it to their own use. have stolen 217,500.00."

The Blast speculates a radius clause, not allowing Scott to perform within a 120-mile radius 1 days before or after RWB may have led to the cancellation, as it would not have allowed him guest performer during Coachella.

Update: the lawsuit has been settled.
